ENABLING SUCCESS TO HAPPEN

Mark Bojeun is unashamedly an enabler. As CEO of Concepts Integration International (CI-2), he sees his role as making it possible for his team to excel at serving clients. That begins with what he calls "extreme communication." He says management is only successful when all parties know what is happening and how their pieces fit into the final solution. So he's the visionary, the facilitator, the enabler of open, honest and effective communication.

"By involving all stakeholders and ensuring that each understands the value of their personal efforts," Mark says, "we build support and confidence in the efforts underway."

The other part of his winning strategy is the quality of excellence in the people he chooses for employment. Under Mark's direction, CI-2 finds itself in the unusual and enviable position of staffing the various projects it manages with self-managed, intrinsically motivated quality leaders. He's worked hard to build an organization that consists of "the best of the best." Each staff member possesses a unique skill set, advanced education, professional certification and extensive experience. He sets a high standard for service, and then empowers his staff to do what they do best.

The results are evident. Mark has guaranteed CI-2's ability to bring projects in on budget, on time and exceeding the client's anticipated level of quality. Most other project management firms wouldn't risk a guarantee like that. But Mark says CI-2 was built to be different. It embraces and "owns" its clients' problems to ensure that the resolution fits both the immediate and long-term needs of the organization.
